

HEAL Coalition ALERT: HEAL Coalition Profiled in Career Education Review

The Higher Education Allied Health Leaders (HEAL) Coalition is proud to inform you of an article from the September 2006 Career Education Review profiling our new endeavor. The article includes information about:

- The growing demand for allied health professionals nationwide;
- The inability of traditional institutions to train all the health workers our country will require – and the ability of proprietary schools to fill this critical gap;
- The many pieces of legislation – including several moving yet this year – which have the potential to impact upon allied health schools; and
- The absence of a voice in Washington advocating on behalf of proprietary allied health – unlike the traditional sector, which has several organizations to represent its own interests.

Congress must be reminded of the quality education and training private career colleges and schools provide to a large and growing segment of the allied health professions workforce. We must ensure that as legislation impacting allied health is being developed it is with our interests, and those of the professionals we educate, in mind. Join now, and through effective advocacy we can make a difference!
